KR Narayanan Memorial Lecture

On 6 November 2016 Dr. Janaki Nair, Professor of History, JNU, New Delhi delivered the KR Narayanan Memorial Lecture organized by CREST at Hotel Alakapuri Auditorium, Kozhikode. Delivering the lecture entitled "The Provocations of the Public University in Contemporary India" she said the Indian University is a radically modern creation, bearing no trace of any earlier forms of knowledge production nor teaching practice since it was the creation of a colonial power in the 19th century. For long serving the purposes of a colonial regime's need for modern bureaucratic elite, the Indian university in its national-modern phase continued to produce an intellectual aristocracy. Yet, from its historical arrival as a space of exclusion and elite formation, it has come a very long way in the past few decades to represent a vital institutional space for ensuring social mobility, especially for those for whom education is the only form of capital when access to other material resources such as property or other forms of social mobility are very limited. India today is faced with the often paralyzing problem of governmental control, a hyper-politicization of governance mechanisms which undermines the autonomy of Universities, Dr. Janaki Nair said.

Janaki Nair teaches Modern History at the Centre for Historical Studies, Jawaharlal Nehru University, Delhi. Her research interests include labor and legal history, urban history, feminism and women's history, as well as studies of visual culture. Her books include Mysore Modern: Rethinking the Region under Princely Rule (2011); The Promise of the Metropolis: Bangalore's Twentieth Century (2005); Miners and Millhands: Work Culture and Politics in Princely Mysore (1998). She regularly writes for publications such as The Hindu and Economic & Political Weekly on current events and issues.

Prof. Janaki Nair was introduced to the audience by Dr. AR Vasavi, member, Governing Council of CREST. Dr. P.K. Michael Tharakan former Vice Chancellor, Kannur university and Member, CREST Governing Council welcomed the audience and Prof. DD Nampoothri, Executive Director gave the vote of thanks.
